□ Frequently Asked Questions (FAQs)

When should I hire an immigration attorney?

You should consider hiring an immigration attorney as soon as you receive a notice from USCIS (like an RFE), face a deadline, or if your immigration history is complex (overstays, previous deportation orders, or unlawful entry). The earlier you involve an attorney, the better they can strategize your case.

2. Can I respond to a Request for Evidence (RFE) on my own?

Technically, yes — but many RFEs require detailed legal and evidentiary responses. An incomplete or incorrect response could lead to a denial. Working with an experienced immigration lawyer ensures that your submission is strong, complete, and timely.

What if I missed an immigration deadline?

Missing deadlines can result in case denials or loss of status. However, an attorney may still help you file a motion to reopen, request an extension (if eligible), or explore other legal remedies.

Do I need a lawyer for an asylum or VAWA application?

While you are not legally required to have a lawyer, these cases are complex and require strong evidence. An attorney can build your case, represent you before USCIS or in court, and ensure you meet all legal requirements.

How much does an immigration lawyer cost?

Fees vary depending on the case type, complexity, and urgency. Many law firms, including Lunel Law, provide a case assessment first to determine the scope of work and offer transparent pricing.

What’s the benefit of hiring a lawyer if my case seems straightforward?

Even “simple” cases can become complicated due to missing documentation, government backlogs, or unexpected RFEs. An attorney increases your chances of success and saves you time and stress.

Can an attorney speed up my case?

While no attorney can bypass official USCIS timelines, an experienced lawyer can avoid unnecessary delays by filing correctly the first time and, where possible, requesting expedited processing when you meet the criteria.
